Jialing Zhang is the Director of the Solid Waste Management Division in the Ministry of Environmental Protection (MEP) of the People's Republic of China. She holds a Masters degree in Environmental Chemistry from Peking University. She has worked for the Ministry of Environmental Protection since 1997, mainly devoted to formulating policies for hazardous waste management, solid waste import and export, e-waste and heavy metal pollution control. Jialing emphasizes the importance of considering the differences in physiological susceptibility between men and women, girls and boys, as well as their subsequent long-term influence in policy development, particularly in relation to steps taken to control heavy metal pollution. During the past 20 years, she has led the formulation of hundreds of policies contributing to the environmentally sound management of hazardous and other wastes.
